As the daughter of an Air Force Major, I had the pleasure of traveling across America on many trips. I have visited the monstrous trees of the Sequoia National Forest, stood on the edge of the Grande Canyon and have jumped on the beds at Caesar's Palace in Lake Tahoe. However, I have discovered that when reflecting on my childhood, it is not the trips that come to mind, instead there are details from everyday doings; a deck of cards, a silver bank or an ice cream flavor.

One memory that comes to mind belongs to a day of no particular importance. It was late in the autumn in Merced, California on the playground of my old elementary school; a cloudy day with the wind blowing strong. The wind was causing miniature tornados. I stood there, watching the leaves go up and then fall down. My friends called me over to the wooden playground to play with them. My shoe became untied and I took a time out to tie it with a method that no one uses here. We heard an adult voice; it was time to go in. We lined up in a single file, in alphabetical order. But I never liked being in the back. While waiting for everyone to line up, I looked up at the trees along the road.

1. The girl did not travel too much _____
2. The girl found the everyday details of her journeys the most memorable _____
3. One memory she had of her elementary school was of a sunny, summer day. _____
4. The day she remembers was particularly windy. _____
5. The leaves were not moving. _____
6. The girl didn't have any friends to play with. _____
